Managing patient expectations and providing clear and accurate information about care and treatment are essential risk management strategies for healthcare providers. These strategies are particularly important when working with patients who are seeking elective cosmetic treatments.

Practitioners who provide cosmetic services need to be confident that their patients have a realistic understanding about the results of treatment. Failure to manage expectations and communicate clearly and truthfully can increase the risk of patient complaints, requests for refunds, and even litigation.

Patient Misperceptions

Several factors may contribute to patient misperceptions about cosmetic procedures. First, the desire to maximize one’s appearance is a highly emotional issue, and some patients expect that a cosmetic treatment or procedure will drastically improve their appearance rather than simply address a particular cosmetic challenge.

Second, insurance often does not cover elective cosmetic services, so patients must make significant financial investments to obtain cosmetic procedures and treatments. As a result, some patients find it difficult to accept the possibility that the actual results might not align with the results they envisioned.

Third, some patients are not merely seeking to improve their appearances; they are really trying to overhaul their identities. When such patients discover that — regardless of the clinical results — they must still deal with the same personal issues, their disappointment may be both illogical and unrelenting.
Finally, providers and staff members need to be sensitive to the possibility that patients may recall promises and optimistic predictions rather than discussions about risks and limitations. Therefore, the importance of informed consent in the cosmetic environment cannot be overstated.

Promises Are Risky

Healthcare providers who promote themselves as cosmetic specialists must be especially careful that their advertising and marketing strategies don’t promise more than they can deliver. When in the market for “self-improvement,” some prospective patients hear only what they want to hear. For this reason, advertising strategies often are designed to promise emotional rather than physical results.

Examples of slogans that perpetuate emotional promises include:

- “Get the body of your dreams by swimsuit season!”
- “A whole new smile — a whole new outlook on life!”
- “Get the appearance you’ve always wanted!”
- “Take off years with a simple, painless procedure!”

None of these slogans offer a specific physical result; rather, they promise idealized outcomes. This type of advertising may draw in potential clients, but it also may attract some people whose vision of change is impossible for even the most talented practitioner to help them achieve.

Advertising and Marketing Liability

Healthcare providers who offer cosmetic services should carefully assess all prospective print and electronic advertising and marketing materials designed to sell their services. When reviewing these materials, both providers and staff members should ask the following questions:

- Will this advertisement attract patients who have realistic expectations?
- Will this advertisement require that we achieve an impossibly high standard of care?
• Does the language use superlatives, make promises that are unrealistic, or urge patients to judge the results by emotional standards rather than clinical standards? Does the language promise or imply absolute satisfaction?

• Do advertisements make critical statements about competitive approaches to the services being offered? Do these comments inadvertently hold the practitioner to a higher standard by comparison?

While advertising motivates a potential client to take action — for example, to buy a particular product or service — marketing strategies generally are designed to trigger initial interest and help individuals identify wants or needs. Marketing materials may also provide reassurance to a client that he/she has made a wise decision, thereby preventing the postdecision guilt known as “buyers’ remorse.”

Practitioners who provide cosmetic services should be careful to distinguish between marketing materials and educational materials. Educational materials should offer patients objective, clear information about the risks and benefits of proposed treatments.

Educational materials are an important component of informed consent. They help patients negotiate the sometimes difficult process of formulating their questions, and they give providers the opportunity to clarify and respond to patients’ concerns. The risk of liability may increase if educational materials are written in terms that maximize the projected outcome of a cosmetic treatment and gloss over its risks.

Further, employees of healthcare practices that offer cosmetic services — in their eagerness to contribute to the success of the practice — might inadvertently mislead patients by referring to the practitioners’ skills or past outcomes with glowing terms that could lead patients to expect the same perfect results, regardless of their individual circumstances. Thus, practice administration should clarify for all members of the team why particular marketing approaches are acceptable and why other tactics are unacceptable.
Conclusion

Health care providers who market themselves as providers of cosmetic services should be cognizant of the border between a promise of dedicated effort on the patient’s behalf and a promise that the patient will achieve an unrealistic outcome.

Advertising and marketing materials should be reviewed for accuracy and for any unintended commitments or promises that might obligate the practitioner to comply with a higher, and perhaps unachievable, standard of care.

Patient education materials should be devoid of marketing hyperbole. Their purpose is to help the patient understand the risks and benefits of a procedure, the treatment plan, and its aftermath, including the patient’s obligation to engage in certain home care procedures and follow-up appointments.

Patients will benefit from candid discussions with their providers about what cosmetic procedures can realistically achieve and what they likely cannot deliver.
